Collect and hold the deposit as Agents for the Landlord through The Dispute Service (TDS), normally equivalent to five weeks for unfurnished and six weeks rental for furnished properties, payable by the tenant to cover any dilapidations, outstanding accounts or unpaid rent found to have accrued at the end of the tenancy. No interest accrued is payable to the landlord or tenant.

The Gas Safety (Installation & Use) Regulations 1998

All gas installation pipe-work and gas appliances must be tested to prove being safe, prior to letting a property. This safety check must be carried out by a CORGI Engineer who also has the necessary NACS (National Accreditation Certification Scheme) certification. We will arrange for a gas service and inspection to be carried out, if necessary, once instructed on the rental property. This will automatically be renewed annually as part of our full management service.

The Electrical Equipment (Safety) Regulations 1994

The regulations for electricity are not as strict or as clear as other safety regulations. The main legislations covering this subject would be the Consumer Protection Act 1987 which states that anything supplied or hired to the consumer MUST be safe, and The Health & Safety at Work Act 1974.

There are also several items of secondary legislation directly relevant to the supply of electrical goods, including: • The Low Voltage Electrical Equipment Regulations 1989 • The Electrical Equipment (Safety) Regulations 1994 • The General Product Safety Regulations 1994 • The Plugs and sockets etc (safety) Regulations 1994 There is no statutory requirement for equipment to undergo a safety check by a qualified engineer but we would advise that such a check be arranged – especially if you are considering supplying a number of electrical items with your property. This is known as a PAT test – Portable Appliance Test and is usually carried out at the same time as a gas safety inspection, annually.

The Plugs & Sockets Regulations 1994 These regulations state that plugs must be 'sleeved' and sockets must comply

Current regulations make the Landlord responsible for ensuring that furnishings in a property comply with the current fire safety regulations. Greatest concerns are mattresses, beds, sofas and armchairs. Before 1988 furnishings could be made from any material and many items in the home were made with inflammable substances such as foam rubber which can emit toxic fumes when burnt. Today soft furnishings sold by a reputable store will have labels attached to show that they comply with the current safety requirements.

Ultimately it is the Courts that interpret the regulations, which have not as yet been fully tested. Landlords take care that you are not smoked out and your name does not become infamous as the test case that proves the rules!

Landlords must ensure that all electrical appliances and the electrical installation is 'safe' and will not cause 'danger'. Inspectors can request confirmation that inspections have been made, although no specific time-scale is given nor is there any requirements for inspections to be made by members of certain bodies, other than the person to be competent. This can be arranged through this office with a competent electrical contractor.

From the 1st January 1997, all new electrical appliances must carry a 'CE' mark and instruction booklet or clear working instructions must be provided. Newly installed plugs and sockets must also comply with regulations.

It is recommended that follow up safety checks are carried out on a regular basis.

PROPERTY MIS-DESCRIPTIONS ACT: The Property Mis-descriptions Act 1991 has been repealed and the Consumer Protection from Unfair Trading 2008 has replaced it.

TERMINATION OF BUSINESS: After receiving confirmation of instructions we shall market the property for letting. You have a 14 day period in which to cancel the instruction. On finding a tenant and proceeding to manage the property we require 3 months written notice to cease management.

DUE DILIGENCE: Section 39 of the Act provides a defence of 'due diligence'. That section provides that it shall be a defence to show that a person took all reasonable steps and exercised all due diligence to avoid committing the offence. Merely asking the landlord to sign a statement that there are no non-compliant items is not considered to be sufficient in this respect. Penalty: The maximum penalty for non-compliance is a fine of £5,000 or six months imprisonment, or both.

ENERGY PERFORMANCE CERTIFICATE (EPC): all rental properties with a new tenancy in England and Wales are required to have an EPC. From 2016 a tenant will be entitled to ask the landlord to carry out the measure recommended on the EPC and the landlord will have a legal obligation to do so if rated F or below.

From 2018 it will be illegal to let a property which has an EPC rating below E.

An EPC is a review of the energy efficiency and environmental impact of your property and will be rated on a scale from A-G, A being the most efficient. It covers the running costs for heating, hot water, and lighting and will also suggest energy saving improvements for your property. The EPC lasts up to 10 years. EPC's are a legal requirement and failure to comply could result in a fine.

The Act provides that, from April 2018 at the latest, it will be unlawful to rent out residential or business premises which do not reach a minimum energy efficiency standard. Although the detailed regulations have not yet been issued, the Government has already indicated that the lowest acceptable energy rating is likely to be E. This means that landlords of F- and G-rated buildings will be unable to let them out after April 2018 unless they take active steps to improve the energy efficiency of those buildings. Depending on the precise wording of the regulations, some E-rated buildings may also fall into the "unlettable" category.
